acceptance speech. Another aria of music was then rendered as a prelude to the commencement pageant, "The Builders". This pageant dramatically depicted the metaphorical figure of Youth, a part well played by Howard Brooks, inquiring from the Spirit of America, in which role Miss Rachel Bearce most winsomely acquitted herself, the way of Life. The Spirit of America then proceeded to show Youth the great need she has for him in the country and the wholesome part which he is expected to play if he wishes to become a creative and constructive Builder. Undergraduates:
This Pageant was most appropriate for the occasion, and its presentation was the most impressive dramatic opus of the school year, thus representing another plane in the already befitting Theban cap of Gould's undelimited and artistic director, Miss Ellen Cottrell. The attractive window, designed and executed by Martha Kinney, William Tonic, and Lawrence Bartlett, assisted by the boys at the manual training shop, occupied an appropriate situation in the center of the stage and opened on several very effective tableaux. The school orchestra furnished the music for the pageant in a most creditable manner, showing the result of cooperative work under the efficient leadership of Mrs. E. R. Bowdoin.

Following the pageant there was another musical offering and the Valedictory address impressively given by Robert T. Davis.

Undoubtedly the most climactic moment of the morning, however, was the awarding of prizes. First was the awarding of the Scholarship Trophy of the class of 1925 to that class maintaining the highest scholastic average. This prize was given to the graduating class of 1930 for having the average grade of 85 and one fourth per cent. The Dr. Charlotte Hammond Poetry Prize of ten dollars was won by Ashby Tibbitts for his poem, "The Birdman". Mr. Hanson then spoke of the fact that Gould Academy has this year become a member of the National Honor Society, a society comparable to the college society of Phi Beta Kappa, excepting that it insists on imposing the requirements of character, leadership and service, as well as mere scholasticity. Only fifteen per cent of the class may be elected to this society each year, hence, only five could be selected from the class of 1930. Three members of the faculty, chosen on the basis of seniority of service, had the unenviable office of selecting these candidates. After mature deliberation they decided because of the exigencies of the situation, to confine themselves to the three candidates for whom they were originally unanimous in their selection, namely, James Dyce Alger, Robert True Davis, and Garnet Rodney Hackwell. The final two prizes, known as the Morris Pratt Character Prizes, awarded exclusively on a basis of character, which includes a serious consideration of the many worthy qualities, such as courtesy, honesty, industry, loyalty, faith, cooperation, respect for rules, and an eagerness to learn, were divided this year, among the boys, between James Dyce Alger, and George Adelbert Parsons, and among the girls, between Leona Frances Brown and Olive Willis Grover.

Principal Frank E. Hanson then conferred the diplomas, a ceremony which was performed in a markedly terse and telling manner. The singing of the class Ode, composed by Charlotte Cole, followed this ceremony and, finally, came the benediction and solemn exit of the senior class. The following students received their diplomas:

James Dyce Alger

Honor Students:
Shortly before one o'clock the alumni gathered in front of the Academy building and formed their line for the procession to the Marion True Gering Students' Home, where a sumptuous banquet prepared under the most efficient supervision of the Matron, Mrs. Chapin, was enjoyed by 150 alumni and friends of the Academy. The dinner was followed by a brief business meeting of the Alumni Association; Mr. Robert Hastings, the president of the Association, conducted the meeting.

The usual reports were read and the following officers were elected: President, Mrs. A. Van Den Kerkhof; Vice-President, Ernest Disher; Secretary, Mrs. Lawrence Lord; Treasurer, Miss Carrie M. Wight. The following executive committee was also appointed: Mrs. W. B. Twaddle, Mrs. E. P. Lyon, Mr. Louis Van, Mr. Robert Hastings, Mr. H. C. Rowe, Mr. Parker Russell, and Miss Grandolin Godwin.

A telegram from Mr. Bingham and Dr. and Mrs. Gehring was read by Professor Hanson, conveying greetings and felicitations for a happy and successful commencement day. The secretary was instructed to wire a message of gratitude.

The business arrangements being completed, President Hastings, as hostmaster, very cleverly and effectively introduced the various speakers. He first called on the following class representatives, each of whom did ample justice to his and her class: Mrs.

Barbara Carter Lyon, class of 1900; Mrs. Maude Gould Rix, class of 1905; Mrs. Una Roberts Stearns, class of 1910; Mrs. Doris Ordway Lord, class of 1920; Miss Ellen Cottrell, class of 1925; and Mr. James D. Alger, class of 1930. A telegram, received too late for reading, brought greetings from Marion Frost Hudson for the class of 1915.

Miss Nellie L. Whitman, for twelve years the head of the department of mathematics at Gould Academy, following a long period of years at Heron Academy, making a total of some fifty-five years of service in schools, gave a most eloquently simple, sincere, and inspiring message to all those assembled, and particularly the class of 1930. Miss Whitman's beautiful character and kindly personality registered themselves in her radiant face as she spoke, bringing to us the smile of an angel's eyes and an earnestness that was in the throat. Mr. Hastings then introduced the speaker of the day, Mr. Ernest Partridge, candidate for the Maine Legislature this spring. Mr. Partridge proved to be a witty, fluent, and unassuming speaker, touching on every relevant subject from religion to the last public address before the June primaries.

The last speaker, Principal Frank E. Hanson, in his customary, brief, but cogent and quietly eloquent manner, gave an exposition of the year's curricula and extra-curricular activities, all pointing toward that steady progress which has ever characterized the many years of Mr. Hanson's benevolent and eminently successful regime. He first observed that Gould Academy has this year enjoyed the largest attendance in the history of this institution, there being a total registration of 171; the capacity of the assembly room accommodating only 150 students, though there are now over 150 seated there, daily, argues pointedly, in his opinion, the decided need of a larger assembly room, or the of the place, with colored streamers and decorative bunting and balloons. In epitomizing the splendid success of the various athletic aspects of the school term, Mr. Hanson needed only to hint at the many laurels won by the winter sports, basketball, baseball and track teams this last school year. He recalled to our minds the fact that the winter sports team attained the county championship, coming in second in the state, at the annual meet at Rumford; that the basketball team attended the State tournament, an honor in itself, despite its many handicaps; that the baseball team won a good proportion of the games played and managed to give one of the best school baseball teams of the state a severe trouncing in its last game, and that the track team again attained first place in the county meet and second place among schools of its size at the State meet. As for scholastic honors, Mr. Hanson remarked that the class of 1930 captured the highest average rank in recent years, one third of the class receiving a rank of 90% or better.

In debating also Gould Academy should justly be proud of its attainments, securing second place in the county and equitably deserving better. Neither is the Academy found wanting when weighed in the intellectual scales, as compared with other schools. Principal Hanson noted, since the New England College Entrance Examination Board, representing several New England Colleges, has given Gould Academy its highest honor: four years of College Entrance Certificate privilege. This honor being based on the successful careers of the Academy's graduates who have gone to college. The announcement of the year, however, of the Principal Hanson of a happy surprise to all registered themselves in her radiant face as she spoke, bringing to us the smile of an angel's eyes and an earnestness that was in the throat. Mr. Hastings then introduced the speaker of the day, Mr. Ernest Partridge, candidate for the Maine Legislature this spring. MAINE PUBLICITY MEETING AT LAKEWOOD

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the Maine Publicity Bureau was held at Lakewood, Tuesday, June 10th. The members of the Committee and their wives were the guests of Mr. W. H. Cummings, President and Herbert L. Sweet, Gen. Mgr. of Lakewood, Inc. In the afternoon Mrs. W. H. Cummings and Mrs. Herbert L. Sweet entertained the ladies of the party at a tea at Lakewood Inn. The meeting of the Committee held at Lakewood Country Club was called to order by President of the Maine Publicity Bureau Hiram Ricker who turned the chair over to Mr. Frank D. Marshall, Chairman of the Executive Committee who thanked Messrs. Cummings and Sweet for their hospitality to the Committee and its guests. He asked Mr. Sweet to tell something of Lakewood but Mr. Sweet urged that the time be devoted to a discussion of Maine as a whole and that suggestions should be made as to the best plan to advance its interests as a recreational State and the best methods to advertise it through the nation.

Mr. Marshall called upon Mr. Harrie B. Cor, Secretary of the Maine Publicity Bureau who spoke of the methods of advertising, mediums used and the results obtained. Indications are, stated Mr. Cor, that this will be a busy summer for Maine. He stated that inquiries covered the entire nation and included 10 foreign countries including Australia, Japan, India, Russia, Germany, and an unusual number of requests for information from the Pacific.

Mr. Hiram Ricker spoke of the need for informing the world of the value of Maine as a health resort with a climate that built bodies and restored health. He said that Maine people knew this, but it was necessary to advertise it to the world at large and that every one should help the organization to do so. He stated a survey of the value of recreational investment was being made through the State Assessment Board and urged all officials to promptly reply to inquiries regarding the matter.

Mr. Cor then asked the Chairman to call upon Major Charles Malley of Parlin Pond, who called attention to the need for selling the Jackman Highway, Route 147, in order to induce travel to and from Canada. He said the Highway Commission had the road in good order but that immediate action was necessary to preserve the road and make it satisfactory through the summer. He stated that this Highway was an asset not only to the Kennebec Valley but the whole State and urged that the Highway Commission be urged to get it sold as soon as possible. He understood the Commission planned to do so but wished to call attention to the need for early treatment to save the surfacing from becoming powdered and dusty. Mr. John W. Bates of Westbrook said that he considered the Jackman Highway the second most important road in value in the State of Maine and that it certainly should be put in condition to make it attractive to tourists who come into the State. Mr. Bates also called attention to the matter of emphasizing the health quality of Maine climate and particularly its appeal to people in the Middle West who ma Canal Zone. Questionnaires sent to people who had made inquiry last summer revealed that visitors had spent an average of $90.25 per capita in the State last summer totaling approximately 125 million dollars. He invited criticism of the Bureau as he stated that was the way they could learn how to make it a more valuable and effective machine.

Blank Verse and Cash

By LAWRENCE REED

(Copyright.)

THREE boxes of chocolates, a cyclamen loaded with gorgeous blossoms, any number of sentimental poems, and a proposal. That's the extent of my loot, Peg. Unbosom yourself, now. What did you get? Peg's best friend put the question concisely as the two girls rested in the room of the bathhouse while Peggy retold her story.

There was a moment's pause. Then Peggy spoke and her tone was so earnest that Jane regarded her wonderingly. "I got about the same collection myself, with our flowers in and of a plant. But, in addition, Jane, I got a whole poem in blank verse written just for me!"

"Him!" said her friend. "That Bertram, I suppose?"

"That Bertram! Well!" There was a herring scorn in Peggy's tone but she was for Jane and not for the blank sinner. "Oh, I know poets are considered fair game, but where would I find a world like there weren't any poets? The sordid people are selling their souls for cold cash, somebody has to keep ideals from dying and—"

And blank verses won't run a sevens passenger car!" retorted Jane. Then, before Peggy could reply, she took out across the lake.

But her words returned to Peggy at evening as she heard the hum of Delos Kent's latest buy as he drove to the curb.

In his attentions to Peggy, young Delos was at present one lap ahead of his rival, Bertram Leonard, the son of a wild stretch of imagination and one who had construed Bertram's genuine offering as anything else but a deep appreciation of Peggy's talent.

Delos Kent was so nearly his tale's best advertisement that when he heard the room Peggy instinctively knew how proud of him she would always be if married to him. Looks, brains, wealth—an indomitable combination, and hers for the asking. How wish she was even to hesitate for a moment.

Kent came straight up to her with his hands outstretched. "Well, dear," he smiled down upon her confidently, "I think this is to be the crowning of my life time." Peggy sent him a level gaze. At his words and the assurance in his tone, some impulse to melt into his arms vanished. He was too sure of himself.

But Peggy's happy eyes told her the reality of her words.

Yet even after the wedding at which Jane was maid-of-honor she solemnly reminded Peggy, "Don't forget, my dear, that I warned you, when you wake up some day to find that blank verse may carry your soul but cold cash pays the butcher's bill."

"Don't worry," said Peggy and blushed her calmly. "Bertram, my dear, has a fortune in his own right and is the only heir of a millionaire grandfather who will be ninety-six his next birthday!"

Loved 'Em All

The second grade teacher was seated at her desk. Up came a little girl with a note which read, "I love you," signed Carl A—.

Another girl ran up with a note just like it.

The teacher stood up, saying: "All the children who received notes bring them to me." It seemed as if the whole school arose as 23 little girls came forward with notes, all reading: "I love you, Carl A—."

"Why did you write to every girl in the room, Carl?" the teacher asked.

By this time the little fellow was crying, but blurted out: "I just loved them all, and I thought they ought to know it!"

The MUTINY OF THE ALBATROSS

THE STORY

CHAPTER I.—Floyd Unwin, unaccountable in life's struggle, with his old friend Bettington, painter of portraits, but not wealthy, take down with their college associate, Alfred Gibbons, a financial magnate. Unwin had taken while in college, to each other in a friendly way, explaining that he needs financial assistance for the education of his son Bob, daughter Mary. Gibbons seems at "regality" of the pledge, but agrees to make a place for Unwin's daughter in his organization. She is to call at office next day.

CHAPTER II.—Bettington arranges to help his old friend Unwin by painting some pictures and selling them. Unwin, twenty years old, is Elvira Unwin's private stenographer. He is a man of vast wealth, but a devotee. Calling at Gibbons' office, as arranged, Mary is asked by the financier to pay her employer's business secrets, money. The girl refuses, and leaves. Mary, exhausted by dissipation, announces his intention of taking a holiday on the coast, but is to be accompanied by a secretary and a wire operator. His wife accepts his intention to go with him. Bettington's Mary Unwin as his secretary on trip, and agrees that her brother accompany them.

CHAPTER III.—Bettington, painting the Maine coast, is caught in a storm and seeks refuge in a shack by Jonathan Gibbs. Next morning Bettington's clothes being ruined by the storm, he does an old outfit of his and sets out to row to the nearest shore. On the way he is decoyed by a boat and knocked senseless. Afterward being conveyed to a hospital and kept prisoner. Gibbs disposes of Bettington's boat empty and fully assumes he is drowned. In painter's clothes he finds money in a New York address. Bettington's Gibbs goes there. He is a live from justice, and one night, without a word, he endures to see by the fire escape, but falls to death.

CHAPTER IV.—Bettington, prisoner on the ship, sees Unwin and others on board. Later Unwin goes to Bettington is questioned by a man known as the "Boss", and explains who he is. He is shown an account of his death in New York, Gibbs having been identified as his. The "Boss" is Bettington in Andrew, once famous surgeon, but now escaped murderer, who had been in a hospital. Bettington's Gibbs goes to the ship and tells him that Unwin's son and daughter are on board the ship, which has been chartered by Bettington. "Clement's" thought nominally the man in master of the boat, and he has Bettington until the man pays $10,000.00 for his release.

CHAPTER V.—Bettington is introduced to the Unwins, Mary and her young cousin, Crosby Todd, wireless operator, and Captain Hallett, who he distrusts him as "Doctor Walte". Crosby, Clements tells Bettington, will outlaws over whom he has power through his knowledge of their crimes. He also tells painter he needs "Orme's" skill as a surgeon.

"I am not sure that a man has lived unless he has actually squeezed the life out of the throats of men he hates."

"What particular lives do you want to end?" Bettington asked.

"The Gibbons gang," Alfred Gibbons first. He and his group have tried for years to hate me to death; it's quite possible."

"They're succeeding apparently," Bettington replied, and pointed to the bottle of absinthe in the rack. "Have you ever thought that they may all be concentrating on you to drink this stuff?"

"You'd Better Lie Down—You Look All In."

"I don't know any surer way of death. You better lie down, you look all in."

"It's my constant headache that knocks me out," Bettington returned, and pressed his temples as though in pain. "Sometimes it is so bad, I actually am blinded. . . . It's their concentrated hate."

Bettington turned away in disgust. The spectacle of this wreck, drifting toward destruction and blaming others for his disaster, seemed pitiful.

"Don't go," Bettington said querulously. "Stay here."

Bettington paid no heed to him. Mrs. Unwin was waiting for him anxiously. She could not rid herself of the feeling that this voyage was to end in tragedy.

"Were you able to do anything?" she demanded eagerly.

For the moment he did not answer. He wanted to ask her a question and did not desire her to feel the humiliation of having to endure his gaze as he asked it.

"Have you any reason," he said gently, "to fear physical violence from him in this state?"

There was a perceptible pause before she answered.

"The possibility exists, but it's most remote."

"If you like," he said, "I'll take one of these forward staterooms to be near him."

He hoped she would construe this to mean that he was merely exhibiting the physician's readiness to be at his patient's side in danger. He did not want her to realize that Bettington's safety meant nothing to him. He felt she would be frightened to learn that his only concern was to protect her from the violence of a man almost insane.

"I think there is no need for that," she returned gratefully. "In fact, it might anger him if he found it out. He has a hatred of being spied upon, as he calls it."

Mary Unwin came up at this moment with Crosby Todd. Mary smiled pleasantly, but the wireless operator paid no attention to the ship's surgeon. Bettington watched Mary with the artist's admiration as she went off with Todd. She seemed to embody youth.

"I hardly realized the child was so beautiful," he muttered.

"She's in love," said Mrs. Unwin. "I don't think she has ever been in love before. She has found a new heaven and a new earth."

Clements passed by.

"There's the man Captain Hallett particularly dislikes," Mrs. Unwin said, when he had gone.

"Don't you?" Bettington demanded. Mrs. Unwin hesitated. "I'm never quite sure. He is so courteous and has such an agreeable voice. . . . and yet, I sometimes feel afraid. Perhaps it is that settled smile which pre-judges one. His features are good. Yes, it must be that smile."

Bettington wondered what the real Clements had been like. The voice had been cultivated to avert suspicion that the face gave rise to. And now the face was gone and one had been created to match the voice.

"Why do you sigh?" Mrs. Unwin asked curiously. She noticed that there was a look of sadness, almost of despair, on his face. He was far too good looking, she had often told herself, to have escaped the attentions of her sex. "Something has upset you, doctor," she exclaimed.

He realized suddenly that he was nervous. Suppose the role he had set out to play was one beyond his ability or courage. He thought of Sam and Metzger and Leary, and the lesser men they controlled. Somehow he felt that Clements was only money-mad and could be satisfied only with money. But Metzger and Sam! Metzger who liked what he called "class," and Sam who loved youth. Even at this moment Sam, enormously broad, prodigiously strong, and in his heart free from all sentiments of pity, was crossing the deck slowly, watching Crosby Todd leaning over the side talking to Mary.

Bettington wondered if there could be a better example of a beautiful woman, beautifully groomed and exquisitely cared for, than the lovely Mrs. Unwin. She had never been deprived of the luxuries of her class and country. Everything about her was beautiful and rare. What a morsel for Metzger!

Bettington was musing on this when he felt a hand on his shoulder. It was Sam. Sam was looking in the direction of Todd. His great flat face was distorted with rage.

"I seen him kissing my gal," Sam growled.

Bettington shook himself free of the sailor's grasp. "He's young and good looking, and you're not."

Sam said no attention to this. He was still glaring at the retreating wireless operator. If murder looked out of human eyes it was focused on Todd then by the deep-chested sailor. Bettington was glad he had an excuse to get away from the angry brute. "I must change my clothes for dinner," he said.

They had to wait for Bettington. Bettington hoped that the owner would not come to dinner.

Mary Unwin was plainly nervous. Mrs. Unwin showed no fear at all. She was playing a bright little dance by Chambrade when Bettington came in. His face was still highly congested. Clements met him with the inevitable cocktail.

It was toward the end of dinner that Bettington made his one remark. It was addressed to Bettington. There was a mocking politeness in his voice. "Is it part of your contract to dine with your employer?"

"Unfortunately it is," Bettington returned instantly.

There was silence until Mrs. Unwin and Mary left. Bettington, who had risen when the ladies did, dropped in his chair and stared at the financier. "It felt like a star over my head," he said. "This was the man who had married the beautiful Mrs. Whitburn and had made her miserable. This was the man who had preyed her so much and had done so little. He wondered what violent vengeance he had been in their lives. She had admitted that there was a possibility of danger for her when he was in this state; and it was no new thing for him to be as he was now."

He told Mrs. Unwin this time not to tell him to go to his quarters. Bettington made his way to the after quarter deck.

It was Clements who interrupted his unhappy meditations. Clements presented an unusual appearance of haste.

"It's 'adway,'" he cried, "you'd better get on at once. I don't know what the man's up to."

Bettington was lying on the floor insensible.

"No wonder after what he's drunk this week," Clements said. "Absolutely dead to the world." He watched Bettington stoop down and carry Bettington to the bed. "By Jingo, but you're strong!" he said.

"I don't think this is drink alone," Bettington said. "I don't like it at all."

Clements had no suspicion that Bettington was not a skilled physician. It chanced that Harrowgate, the celebrated painter, had just such a seizure as this in the studio he shared with Bettington in Rome. The doctor who attended him put Harrowgate's feet in hot mustard and water and applied ice to his head. Clements saw Bettington loosen the senseless man's clothing and then begin the treatment.

After a while Bettington opened his eyes.

"I remember falling," he said presently. "I must have knocked myself out. I'll be all right in the morning." In a sense he dismissed them peremptorily.

They heard him bolt the door when they were outside it.

"Clements," Bettington said with conviction. "You've helped him to kill himself. That man's very ill."

"Nonsense," Clements said. "You're a surgeon and this sort of thing isn't your line at all. It's like asking a racehorse to pull a huckster's van."

As for my helping him to kill himself, that's absurd. What that man has wanted he has taken. The whole world knows that."

"I suppose so," Bettington admitted. After all, neither he nor a steward had any control over Bettington's appetites.

"I want you to meet the other men," Clements said.

"I've seen them already," Bettington returned.

"You are to meet them on a different footing this time. They feel you have no right to be supercilious. There is only one boss among them, and I'm he. They are to be in my stateroom within a few minutes. For your own good, I advise you to seek their goodwill."

Bettington looked at him squarely. "If you think I'm going to make a bosom friend of men like Sam and that hangdog Hammer, you are mistaken. I did not elect to come on this trip and I shall behave as I choose. I signed on as ship's surgeon. Very well, I'll play the part, but whenever did you know of a ship's surgeon making a companion of a deck hand?"

They traversed the length of the ship in silence. Bettington felt certain that Clements was enraged at what he supposed to be insubordination.

"I will not have my plans imperiled," Clements said, in the safety of his stateroom. "You must be careful not to risk any quarreling with them. They are hot-headed and feel you are reveling in luxury, while they work hard."

"You are thinking of Metzger?"

"Particularly of him. He is a jealous brute, as ready with a knife as with his tongue. He complains that you glare at him offensively."

"And shall continue to do so."

"Do you mean to defy me? Have you forgotten that I hold your life in my hand?"

"Have you forgotten that the master of Beardsley will some day hold your life in his?"

There was a subtle change in Clements' bearing.

"We must not misunderstand one another. Yes, I depend on you; I admit it. We are using these swine for our own purposes, but we must not let them know it nor get out of hand. I think I hear them outside now. For the success of the venture, unbend to them."

The cook, who walked majestically and had the air of one who has cooked but for kings, was introduced as Antonio Perera.

"A very skilled user of the knife," Clements said. "He would be in a palace kitchen now but for it. He has all the villainy of the world at his fingertips."

Antonio Perera bowed as one might who had been introduced as the greatest musician of his time.

"Graumann," Clements went on, "is the greatest 'peteman' out of jail. I have uses for him later, among the ports of South America. Kenda has no special attributes except his skill as an engineer and a preference for crooked paths. Krause"—he indicated a blond man, almost bald—"Krause has the newspaper instinct. He is an expert at listening posts. As a news gatherer he has few equals. These four men, doctor, know their jobs."

Bettington bowed to them amiably. He longed to transfer their faces to canvas. Each one a different type and yet each wholly villainous. The cook was the most picturesque; Hammer the one he most disliked. Graumann looked like a wolf without disguise.

The meeting resolved itself into a kind of committee meeting in which accounts of the past week's business was demanded by the chairman. There was no wild incendiary talk.

When the others had gone Bettington turned to the steward. "I'm anxious to know when you plan to let Bettington discover how things are."

"Not for a long time. It will be two weeks more, let us say."

CHURCH ACTIVITIES

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

L. A. Edwards, Pastor
10:45 Morning Worship. Subject of sermon, "The Broadness of the Narrow Way and the Narrowness of the Broad Way."

Some highways are broad enough for two cars to pass in safety, if each car travels where it belongs; but almost any road is too narrow if they try to pass on the same side.

Some men are Broad Minded, that is they travel the Broad way in their thinking and actions; but beside the person who gets in their path.

Such persons usually have a good deal to say about the narrowness of their fellows. Well there is a Narrow way that Jesus said "Leadeth unto life." Yes, it is too narrow to admit some of the things that some of us want to carry with us.

The Ladies' Club will meet with Mrs. H. H. Hastings on Thursday afternoon.
